Letter From Don Johnson

Dear all,

Now that it is time to write this to everyone it seems all the harder.

To catch us up on the last few weeks; Dr. Ashida spent the Memorial Day weekend at the AM-CANS having the best time he has had in several years, (his words). The Judo family that has meant so much to him over the years was out in force and he got to share this time with him.

On Tuesday he awoke in the morning having a great deal of difficulty both in speaking and understanding. He had had a stroke. The tests showed it had been going on for at least a week. The ensuing weeks found him split between Highland and St. Mary's hospitals, doing rehabbing in the latter.

Saturday and Sunday, the 20th & 21ST of June was spent with his family for Fathers Day. On Monday morning after a full breakfast he asked for a glass of milk, when his aide came back a fatal heart attack had claimed him.

The Family cannot express how grateful we all are for the support and kindness at this time and in the past. The plans for the immediate future are being worked out and we will keep everyone in the loop.

Thanks again,
Don Johnson
(son-in-law)

Dr. Sachio Ashida

Dr. Sachio Ashida, Ph.D., was an extraordinary man. He had a long career in academia, including his last position at SUNY Brockport, where he was a professor of psychology. The Brockport Judo Club, Renshikan, is still going strong. He worked to improve and promote Kodokan Judo in the U.S. and became a highly respected competitor, coach and referee. He was a coach at the 1976 Olympic Games and the only American judo referee at the 1984 Olympic Games. He died June 22, at the age of 85.

He learned Kodokan Judo during his early years in Japan. When he was 20, Dr. Ashida was drafted into the Japanese Imperial Air Force. He saw the devastation that occurred in Hiroshima with the atom bomb.

When he arrived in the U.S. in 1953, it was to attend the University of Nebraska. There he earned a Ph.D. in experimental psychology. His English tutor, Margaret Eleanor Elliot, became his wife in 1956 and they had daughters Margaret and Janet. Both Janet (a 5th degree black belt) and her son, Alan Genji Ashida Johnson (an Orange Belt with green tabs), carry on Dr. Ashida's judo legacy - along with the many students at the judo clubs he began.

Dr. Ashida believed that the tenets of judo could and should be applied to both to judo and the judo practitioner's life outside the sport. Judo's tenets became the way one lived. Whether it is facing a problem head on, knowing how to fall and recover, or mutual welfare, the tenets of judo have much to teach us both in the sport and in life.

Challenging the Champ by Gerald Lafon

Many Judo clubs, especially small ones, suffer from a common problem: how to provide meaningful training opportunities for the exceptional player, the “champ,” who by virtue of his size and skill is infrequently challenged during randori.

The champ usually fares well when it comes to pre-arranged technical drills and to a lesser extent situational drills. After all, training partners need not be world champions to be good uke during technical drills. They only need to be capable of performing uke’s role in the drill. However, when it comes to randori, many clubs are unable to provide the champ with a challenging workout if they resort to standard randori.

During randori the champ needs to approximate the physiological, physical, and psychological demands of a competitive match, which may last from 3-5 minutes. This might be an exercise in futility if he’s more physical and skillful than his training partners. While some of the demands of competition can be met through conditioning off mat, this article focuses solely on Judo drills that can be performed during the course of regular training sessions.

The objective of the drills listed below is to challenge the champ mentally and physically. Keep in mind the requirement to balance the champ’s need for harder training while making sure that training partners are not abused and over-taxed. The drills listed below allow the coach to give the champ what he needs while maintaining the welfare of training partners and the integrity of the club.

2v1 Ne Waza Randori

In this ne waza drill two training partners simultaneously attack the champ. At times, one partner may momentarily disengage from the drill so that the action remains fluid. For example, if both training partners manage to pin the champ, one should back off and let the action continue one against one. When the champ gets out of the pin, it’s time to go two against one again. Length of this drill is 3-5 minutes.

Osae Komi Escapes

Two to three training partners are required for this drill, in which the champ must constantly and successfully escape from pins. Depending on size and skill difference between the champ and training partners, this drill is conducted in a one against one or two against one format. The champ starts off pinned. He escapes only to allow himself to be pinned again by the next training partner. If the escapes are too easy, a second training partner can add a little resistance by pressing down on the first training partner or by holding the champ’s leg or arm as he tries to escape. Conversely, if the escapes are too hard, training partners must allow the champ to move and to successfully escape. Use different pins, and attack from both sides as well. Length of this drill is 3-5 minutes.

Pre-Fatigue Randori

Prior to a round of randori, pre-fatigue the champ by having him do a set of push-ups, burpees, or a 30-second round of one for one. When using the one for one protocol, have the champ do it with one training partner, and then perform the randori session with a fresh partner.

Fresh Partners Randori

In this five-minute round of randori, the champ fights a fresh partner every minute. This keeps the pace of the round at a very high level, even if the training partners are not as technically proficient as the champ. It’s important that training partners use grip fighting and movement to force the champ to be active. This also can be performed as a ne waza drill.

One for One

The champ and partner throw each other as quickly as possible using a forward throw that facilitates a quick execution, i.e. ippon seoi nage, koshi guruma, or tai otoshi. The goal is to perform as many throws as possible in a specific time. This speed drill can be a stand-alone drill or incorporated into any of the previous drills.

As a stand-alone, interval training drill, you can do repeats of 30 seconds every two minutes (1:3 work-rest ratio) or, depending on the fitness of your players and the phase of their training cycle, you may want to tackle the more demanding Tabata protocol. In this case, throw for 20 seconds, rest for 10 seconds (2:1 work-rest ratio), and repeat 6-8 times. Use fresh partners for each work bout.

Use a 15- or 30-second bout before, during, or after a short round of randori (2-3 minutes) or in conjunction with 2v1 Ne Waza Randori, Osaie Komi Escapes, or Fresh Partners Randori. Use a fresh partner for the one for one.

It's up to the coach to decide the "when, how many, how long, how often" part of the training equation. This decision should be based on the training cycle and fitness level of the champ. Any of these drills also can be used periodically to spice up the training routine of any Judo class. Since these drills are intensive, use them in moderation with your recreational membership.

Coach Lafon, 6th Dan, started Judo in 1965. Local Instructor Wins at Nationals by Gary Goltz

Brad Karman (center) at Nationals after winning the Open Division

Brad Karman, 55, of Riverside who is an instructor at Goltz Judo Club in Claremont, recently won double gold medals at the Judo Nationals held in San Diego. "He won both his weight division and the open weight division defeating some very formidable opponents" according to Gary Goltz, founder and head instructor of the club.

Early Texas Judo by E.E. Carol

I had wrestled for four years for Kansas State University. I saw a judo class at Fort Hood, Texas, about a year after I left. Guys were banging each other's ankles, anklebone to anklebone, and using elbows to force opponents to the mat. Wrestling wasn't all that gentle but a lot smoother than what I saw that night, so I spent the next two years in scuba diving classes. That was fun, though there weren't many places to dive in Texas.

About a year after I left the Army, I joined the Dallas Police Department. I had planned on staying a year or so to get the lay of the land so I could find a real job. I discovered early on that I was small, mouthy, and not popular.

After many trips to different karate dojo I discovered the Tamura Judo Institute. Judo appeared similar to wrestling, so I signed up right away. Tamura Sensei and almost forty other judoka in the dojo soon convinced me that judo and wrestling were not that much alike.

I wanted to compete as soon as possible. Tamura Sensei allowed me to when I had attained my green belt. I went to eighteen tournaments, fought two matches, and came home. My first win was in the small town of Silverton, Texas. I was finally a brown belt and actually had a student who went with me. We figured there couldn't be many competitors in Silverton. We were right.

Our only competition was against the first and second place winners of the Texas State Championships in my division. My student had only three brown belts to fight. Well, being outclassed had never slowed me before, so I got into it and beat both opponents. It wasn't pretty with failed throws, sloppy pins, poor chokes, and finally a successful arm bar. My student fared better and beat all three brown belts with osoto-gari. We had driven 300 miles into the panhandle to win those two trophies.

The Tamura Judo Institute sponsored the Dallas Invitational Tournament every year. All the big clubs brought teams and individual players. There were weight divisions, but no one paid much attention to them in team matches.

I was on the Tamura "C" team of mostly brown and a couple of really old black belts. Our lightweight and lower middleweight players got lucky and won their matches, putting us up for third place if the rest of us could win anything. My turn came. I stepped onto the mat watching Tamura Sensei for direction, so didn't see my opponent until I got to the center of the mat and bowed. When I straightened up, I could see only the other guy's belt! His nickname was Tiny, and he was 6'5" and weighed three hundred pounds! I tipped the scale at 176. Did I mention that no one paid much attention to weight divisions?

When I straightened up, I could see only the other guy's belt! His nickname was Tiny, and he was 6'5" and weighed three hundred pounds! I tipped the scale at 176.

The match didn't last long. Tiny lunged at me, and I attempted ippon-seoinage. He just collapsed on me, so I wriggled around and got my legs around his waist. I got my hands in for the choke and pulled him close. His eyes rolled up in his head, and he went limp, his entire weight on my hands and chest. I couldn't turn loose! I told the referee, "Hey! This guy's choked out!" The referee asked if I wanted to surrender. I told him no but that Tiny was out and I couldn't let go or get him off. Then the referee understood and unsuccessfully tried to move Tiny off me. Both corner judges jumped in to assist but couldn't get Tiny's 300 pounds of dead weight to move. A spectator came onto the mat to help. Tiny was out cold. But when the referee sat him up to resuscitate him, Tiny started fighting again!

The two old black belts also won their matches, so we wound up taking second place to Tamura's "A" team.

The Dallas tournaments were particular about what national organization one belonged to and about all the rules of judo. Other towns were not so fussy. I used to ride my motorcycle to Fort Hood, referee kids' matches all morning, and fight all afternoon. I would fight in the 176, 187, 205, and open divisions. I'd take second or third in the 176-pound division and win all the others. I was so short I didn't have to bend over to throw bigger opponents. And they never believed such a little guy could pin them. I did win my 176-pound division once, defeating an opponent who was 6'4" and weighed 176. I tried ippon-seoinage on him and saw him standing flat-footed on as my head was scraping the mat! Finally I threw him with long-armed tai-otos. San Antonio always was fun, with judoka who were strong, eager, and willing to buy the beer afterwards.

The good old days were exciting, but I hated the political backbiting that wouldn't recognize outsiders' ranks. I hated the selling of rank and favoritism shown by some referees. You had to know where you were to understand what rules would be enforced and which ones ignored. Today things are better. I am still not happy with the political fighting inside and between the national organizations, but they have recognized each other and set rules and standards that are accepted by almost everyone. Believe me, that is a good thing!

Sensei Kraft At Ark Judo Seminar

On May 31, 2009, ARK JUDO put on a seminar in North West Arkansas. We flew in Sensei Hank Kraft from New York City. Sensei Kraft was the person who taught Michael Dobbs (ARK JUDO's founder and instructor) the art and the beauty of Judo some 30 years ago. He is a great teacher, and has trained 55 national and international competitors who have ranked 1st, 2nd, or 3rd in their division.

Sensei Kraft was here for just one weekend and he gave a 2 day seminar. In this time, he taught the basics of Kodokan Judo. This was not a seminar about flamboyant technique. We broke down and studied Ukemi, Ashi Wasa, Osoto Gari, Ouchi Gari, Ippon Seonagi, Morote Seonagi, Tio Toshi, Harai Goshi. The basics of Judo. Interesting? Was there much for us all to learn? Oh yes. We all dream of the perfect throw... what is it? Uchi Mata? Sutemi Waza? Some great combination? Maybe great Judo is not the complex... maybe it about fundamental Judo. Basic Judo. We keep working on the basics, perfecting them.

Sensei Kraft took each technique and broke them down into the basic parts. He worked with each Judoka individually. He also took the time to show some great drills, teaching the instructors present how to strengthen our Judoka's technique.

This was a great event for everyone. White belts were engaged and learning... as were Black Belts. We learned and enjoyed. We can all learn from a master. Another point. All of the clubs present at this event were USJA. Sensei Kraft is USJF. What's the difference... it's all Judo!

Grass Root Scrimmages on Long Island by Marc Cohen, Go Rin Dojo

When you think of Long Island in New York, what generally comes to mind is the white sand beaches in the Hamptons, celebrity hi-jinks, Fire Island and the Gold Coast where old money resides on one hundred acre estates overlooking the Long Island Sound. In all, Long Island is about 125 miles from Brooklyn to Montauk Point and about 35 miles at its widest point between the south and north shores. What you probably don't think about is Long Island Judo.

Judo is alive and well on Long Island. With an estimated population of about two million people, we boast about a dozen active Judo clubs in Nassau and Suffolk counties. We have about around 300 children and adults on the mats during any given week and that does not count the outer boroughs of New York City, Brooklyn and Queens; both are part of the Long Island land mass.

As active partners in the Long Island Judo community, Dave Passoff and I have the distinct pleasure of bringing together those diverse and far-flung clubs about three or four times a year for free Long Island Scrimmages. Understand that there are dozens and dozens of Metro-New York tournaments from September through June. The issue for many of the Judo families is that, often times, it is difficult for everyone to get a tournament in New Jersey or Connecticut due to distance, expense and the infamous New York traffic jams.

The scrimmages gives us an opportunity to get together in less formal atmosphere in order the for kids, and adults and the instructors to meet and mingle in a less structured environment. The entire day or evening spans a maximum of three hours and we generally host somewhere between thirty and sixty participants, not counting parents and instructors.

We use a formula that has been successful for all of these years. We begin with a Kohaku line shiai using team rules. We line the kids up in a rough line by height, weight and experience. We then separate the line into two opposing lines, which also give the instructors a chance to make last minute changes in the line-ups.

The scoring for Kohaku is traditional. We do not use Yuko, just Ippon and Waza-ari. The matches are 2 minutes in length and begin with the two smallest opposing players reporting to the middle of the mat. The winning player stays up to face the next opposing member of the opposite team while the loser goes back to his or her line to watch and root on his team. If no one wins after the two minute match time expires, the referee calls Hiki-Waki and both players retire to their lines so that the next two in line come up for the next match.

The contest ends when either one team runs out of players to come up to the line to play or if both teams expire all of their players. Both lines report their total wins and the higher number of overall wins then get the team prize. The prize is that they have the other team perform the twenty "sacred push-ups" for the winning team's to count off.

Now that the competitive juices have been tapped into and everyone is having a great time, the club instructors put together one or more five-person teams to compete in club competition against the other clubs present. Instructors can “draft” members of the other clubs and trade their own players to other clubs so that the teams are even in ability. The “clubs against club” matches use all of the IJF rules and points. This is a good learning experience for the members of the club who do not routinely play in shiai and give the sensei an opportunity to review the play and abilities of all of the participants.

The scrimmage continues with the club teams going against one and other for the best of five points wins. There are no sacred push-ups involved in the win, just the satisfaction of being able to play your best without the pressure of traditional Shiai and without having to spend the entire day working at it.

The clubs that were involved in the March 8, 2009 scrimmage and the instructors who were present were:

Go Rin Dojo	Sensei Marc Cohen
Syosset PAL Judo	Sensei Dave Passoff
Great Neck PAL Judo	Sensei Dave Passoff
Combat Judo	Sensei Mike Arcuri
Westbury PAL Judo	Sensei Mike Goldsmith

The next scrimmage is planned for April or May of this year.

How To Celebrate A Black Belt by Marc Cohen

I remember my first belt promotion ceremony. My sensei handed me a dojo certificate. I bought a package of Rit dye and dyed my white belt yellow. I also had presence of mind to rinse the newly dyed belt in hot water, thereby avoiding the embarrassment of a permanent yellow stripe around my waist.

Ever since that first ceremony I've wondered what promotions in feudal Japan might have been like. I've participated in countless promotions, usually with students lined up as those being promoted were called to receive their new belts, after which club members ceremoniously threw the newly promoted.

That was pretty good but didn't seem appropriate for a yudansha ceremony. It lacked the dignity and decorum required for a more solemn occasion. Through on-line research, calls, and emails I discovered that ceremonies in Asia had a reoccurring theme — lineage.

Recently I promoted two students to shodan. After years of practice and a grueling examination, I thought that they and their parents would appreciate a ceremony with meaning and dignity. I designed one based upon the lineage concept as well as information gleaned from my research.

I set up four levels of candles. The top level consisted of a single candle to represent the Kaiso, Jigoro Kano. The second level represented my own instructors: George Yoshida, Fred Bernstein, and Ivan Villegas. When I lit their candles, I also mentioned their instructors -- Taguchi, Yamauchi, and Nakabayashi -- so that the lineage was complete.

The third row had a single candle on it, representing me. Below my candle were two unlit ones representing the new shodan. When I individually called them up, they took their new black obi from in front of their candles, tied it around the waist, and then lit their candles. All lighted candles then represented an unbroken lineage from the founder through two levels of instruction to themselves.

When these new yudansha have the opportunity to promote a student to black belt, they can recreate the ceremony with five, instead of four levels. If my strategy is correct —and I never will know if it actually happens —then someone two generations in the future would celebrate a similar ceremony with seven or more levels of candles.

Keeping alive the memory of those who made it possible for others to learn is, in a small measure, the best way of keeping alive both the memory and the art.

Marc Cohen holds rokudan rank in judo. He has successfully run the Go Rin Dojo on Long Island in New York for 25 years. His students have won dozens of titles in local, regional, and national tournaments. Many of Cohen Sensei's students have sent their own children to become his students.

So What's Your Excuse? by Ronald Allan Charles

As a gainfully employed classroom teacher I routinely heard excuses for not turning in homework. The most novel: "My cat ate it." I hope that cat developed an appetite for geography, because his human companion certainly hadn't. The lad received the same homework grade he would have gotten had his dog consumed it.

Creative excuses offered to police officers include driving faster to induce sweating over being caught as an attempt to lose weight; driving faster to reach a gas station before running out of fuel; cruising without stopping through a blinking red light by going between blinks; rocketing at over 100 mph for several minutes to get out of the way of the police car; and trying to outrun police because the spouse ran off with a law enforcement officer whom the driver feared was returning her. At The Citadel and in the Army I learned that the maximum range of an excuse is zero meters. Not coincidentally, that's precisely the maximum range measured in yards.

Judo's founder Jigoro Kano had it right when he said, "The only wrong thing one can do in judo is to miss a class." If you don't drag your mass to class, you cannot learn. Learning judo from a book or video is neither fun nor easy.

I tell students that I cannot teach them when they are absent. And I'd rather have them arrive late than not at all. Even if injured and observing from mat side, dedicated judoka will learn something.

Experienced judoka lacking credentials wander occasionally into our dojo. Perhaps these ronin or masterless samurai have randoried with bears in the forest, wrapped their obi around trees for uchi-komi, and meditated beneath waterfalls. Excuses for missing credentials range from an angry spouse trashing paperwork before dumping her jerk husband while he was serving on submarine duty, to a house fire. Often a lazy former sensei had promised to process paperwork but never followed through. Many ronin were on the cusp of their next promotion. No adult judoka has blamed a diploma-eating pet.

Fortunately the United States Judo Association has a procedure to remedy missing or consumed paperwork. We evaluate and validate that person's skills so as to place the new member on the rank ladder from whence to proceed through traditional time-in-grade, point, and technical requirements. We needn't track down pets to choke into coughing up credentials. When these lost judoka finally settle down and earn promotion certificates, they will frame and hang them out of reach of ravenous dogs and cats.

So don't bother thinking up creative excuses. Sensei has better things to do and probably has heard most. There's no black belt for making excuses.

Ronald Allan Charles, Ph.D., has validated and put on the right path to judo growth many stray judoka during his nearly half-century in judo. He holds hachidan judo and rokudan jujitsu ranks and teaches without charge at MWR Athletics on the Navy Weapons Station in beautiful, romantic Goose Creek, South Carolina.
